CONGRESSMEN'S WIVES. Five-and-twenty years ago there were seldom over five-and-twenty Congressmen who brought their wives to Washington and kept them there during the session. Up to about that time the Senators and Representatives lived here in what were called "messes." From half-adozen to fifteen congenial spirits would take rooms at some boarding house with the understanding that no one else was to be admitted, and the party thus formed a family circle. In many of these "messes" no ladies were tolerated, while in others the chief attraction was the wife of some Senator or Representative, who was virtually the queen was the wife of some Senator or Representative, who was virtually the queen of the establishment. Was it to be wondered at that so many Congressmen used to pass their evenings in "fighting the tiger" at some of the comfortable gaming-helis on the avenue, or in carousals at the gorgeously fitted-up establishments near by? Washington city was then a very immoral city, and many a fine intellect failed to preserve its owner from temptation. Now-a-days matters have changed. There are to-day in Washington forty-five Senators out of have changed. There are to-day in Washington forty-five Senators out of seventy-two, and one hundred and six Representatives out of two hundred and thirty-five, who are accompanied by their wives. And these one hundred and fifty-one wives of Congressmen excrose a potent influence. Gambing, firmkenness, and other vices which it is not necessary to name here, once so common among Senators and Representatives, are not now openly practiced of practiced at all—by any of them. About facty Congressmen keep house, and are benefited by the social influences of home, while the others board at hotels and boarding houses, where agreenotels and boarding houses, where agreenotes and boarding nouses, where agrees able circles are formed. Eigiteen Semators and twenty-four Representatives have also here with them daughters who go into society; others are accompanied by female relatives or friends; and thirty have with them children too young to go out. So the successors of men who used to pass their evenings at a faro-lank or poker-table escort their daugh-

on the effect of the moon upon vegetation, non-which tend to confirm the popular no-non-non this subject: It is well known stair mons on this subject: It is well known that glass aquariums, placed in the light, som become invaded by algoid growths, which in some cases, after a time, pervale the whole of the interior. M. Carbonnier, requiring to keep a number of these reservoirs perfectly clean, found that, while in some cases no vegetation appeared for ten days, or even more, in others it was completely developed in two or three days. Watching these phenomena with care for some time, he came to the conviction that the maximum intensity of this vegetation corresponded with the time of the full moon; he found that the increase diminished during the other phases of the moon until it was imperceptible, and, while at full moon the aquariums had to be cleaned every day, after that period twice a week proved. ported, seem to be wanting in precision, and need to be confirmed by other observers, with careful attention to the source and kind of the water supply. and he able to explain them. The experi-ments of M. Carbonnier, so far as re-minister Herald gives the following account of the finding of human remains by hearted stoic may boastingly accede to the sentiment that "man is sufficient for himself;" but the philanthropist rejoices the Jarvis surveying party: On the head waters of the Bonaparte, a spot re-moved from any trail, were found the cones of what had once been a human seing. The remnants of a pair of gum toots, the blade of a sheath knife, and a sty prospecting pan, which was a sty prospecting pan, which was a style of the sheath knife, and a style prospecting pan, which was a style of the sheath knife, and a style prospecting pan, which was a style of the sheath knife, and a style of the ones of what had once been a human boots, the blade of a sheath knife, and a rusty prospecting pan, which were the only articles discovered near, after a vigilant search, left no doubt that the skeleton was that of some hardy prospector, who had there laid himself down pector, who had there laid himself down pector. with mute eloquence of the last convulsions that had racked the poor, famine-slain body. Near the remains was a pile of firewood, ready to be kindled, and me of the trees near by bore marks as if the bark had been stripped and gnawed. On the Sunday after the discovery the whole camp turned out, collected the remains and buried them, erecting a cross over the grave. No sign or writing could be discovered, either on the prospecting pan or on the trees near by. It is thought, from the appearance of the remains, that many years—probably ten

DEVIL WORSHIP IN CEYLON .-- A traveler, who has visited Ceylon, tells of a peculiar form of worship they have there, and of the odd way in which it is carried and of the odd way in which it is carried ont. "A good many of the natives," he said, "worship the devil; service every Tuesday evening. One evening I went—as a spectator, of course. The devotees of his Sublimity assemble in a prominence overlooking a deep gorge in the cliff by the sea. Half-way below, on the other side of the gorge, is a cavern, the supposed residence of the object of worship. Those attending the service bring offerings, and deliver them to their priest, ship. Those attending the bollerings, and deliver them to their priest, who goes through a ceremony with lond invocations and a great deal in the way of genuterion; and at the climax he of genuterion; and at the climar he throws a cocca-nut at the entrance of the cave. A great bell is then set ringing, the worshippers fall prostrate, and so remain until the ringer is exhausted, when they rise and retire." A singular illustration this of the humorous side sometimes belonging to the serious; of the way in which even that held to be sacred sometimes gets mixed up with the meetings to pelt the devil with cocon-nuts being, no doubt, a solemn idea in the minds of the worshippers, but rather calculated to amuse the rest of the world

A RELIGIOUS contemporary tells how standious contemporary tells how systematic penny giving recently saved a church in Wisconsin which was embarassed with a debt of $10,000 that it would have been impossible to pay in the ordinary way. The pastor divided the debt into penny shares to be paid daily for five hundred days, and it was litted accordingly.
